British nobility descended from him to this day. Much of it in Scotland."

"Including you."

"Yes, on my mother's side. But I'm also descended from the Sarah-Tamar line on my father's side, as you are."

An incongruous beeping interrupted him. He cursed and picked up the cell phone, speaking rapidly in French, then clicking it off.

"That was Roland. Jean-Claude has arrived to take you away from me."

Maureen could not mask her disappointment. She wasn't ready to leave all of this yet. "But I haven't seen the third branch of the garden."

Sinclair's face seemed to darken. It was hardly perceptible, but it was there.

"Perhaps that's for the best," he said. "It's such a beautiful day. And that," he indicated with a nod of his head, "is the garden of the Magdalene's eldest son."

He answered Maureen's unspoken question in the enigmatic and vague way of which the natives of this region seemed infuriatingly fond.

"And while it is beautiful in its own way, that garden is too filled with shadows for a day such as this."

As Sinclair led Maureen back out of the garden, he stopped at the gilded gates.

"The day you arrived here, you asked why I was so partial to the fleur-de-lis. This is why. Fleur-de-lis means 'flower of the lily,' and as you now know, the lily is symbolic of Mary Magdalene. The 'flower of the lily' represents her offspring. There are three of them, therefore the three petals on the flower."

He demonstrated by tracing the three branches with his finger.

"The first branch, her eldest son John-Joseph, is a very complex character about whom I will tell you more when the time is right. But
