Bultheel verkent in The Thief's Journal: Songs of Decreation hoe architectuur als muziekinstrument kan dienen.

It is my pleasure to invite you to Billy Bultheel's captivating performance The Thief's Journal: Songs of Decreation, featured as part of the Amsterdam Art Week program. Early bird tickets are now sold out, but for my newsletter readers I have made available a special discount code for both days. ❤️

Exploring architectural space as a musical instrument, The Thief's Journal: Songs of Decreation is written for nine musicians, crossing live and electronic music with a site-specific performance and scenography within the Brutalist architecture of the Thomas church.

Bultheel's The Thief's Journal: Songs of Decreation takes its name from the semi-fictional autobiography of Jean Genet, the French novelist, playwright, poet, and activist. In this work, Genet deploys religious and Christian language to poetically depict the lives of societal outcasts, including convicts, thieves, and beggars. Paying homage to the writer's contrasts of high and low culture, the musical language of The Thief's Journal: Songs of Decreation fuses the religious with the cathartic, the sacral with the industrial, and the communal with the ritualistic. The scenographic framework, too, invites musicians and the audience to navigate a dynamic experience in which music becomes spatial, tangible, and visual—an extraordinary exploration where sound intersects with architecture and movement.
