SYNOPSIS

Imagine that you are pregnant. You are in your ninth month. You feel an intense pain. You faint. When you wake up you are at the hospital, surrounded by police officers. They accuse you of having killed your own baby. This is the story of Teodora Vásquez, the spokesperson of The Seventeen, the women accused of aggravated homicide in El Salvador because of having a miscarriage or a stillbirth.

Fly So Far follows Teodora and The Seventeen in their struggle to regain their freedom. Due to the criminalization of abortion, they have been sentenced up to 30 years in prison for having an obstetric emergency. Their testimonies and cases are evidence of the State's violence against women, but also of collective resilience, solidarity and sisterhood.

TEODORA VÁSQUEZ & THE 17+

TEODORA VÁSQUEZ was in the ninth month of her second pregnancy in 2007 when she fainted and had a stillbirth while working. When she woke up at the hospital, she was accused of murder and sentenced to 30 years of prison. Teodora became the spokesperson of the women facing the same charges as her.

THE SEVENTEEN is the group of women imprisoned at the Ilopango prison who have been accused of aggravated homicide after having a miscarriage. All of them belong to the Salvadorean rural and urban working class. Many of the women became pregnant after being sexually abused. Some of them have spent more than 15 years in prison.

BACKGROUND

EL SALVADOR HAS ONE of the most restrictive abortion laws in the world. It is one of five countries where abortion is not permitted under any circumstance. In 1998, two major changes in the Penal Code and the Constitution were made by the Legislative Assembly. The first was Article 133 in the Penal Code, which prohibited abortion under any circumstance and is punishable with two to eight years in prison, applicable both to the woman and the doctor or other healthcare personnel who assist the abortion. The second change was the addition of the term "conception" to the Salvadorean Constitution which states, "life begins at conception". Together these changes led to a total ban of abortion denying Salvadorean women the right to choose. Since 1998, more than 181 women have been criminalized for abortion, but convicted for aggravated homicide which carries a sentence of up to 30 years in prison. The change in crime occurs during trial where the judge may determine a miscarriage or stillbirth as aggravated homicide. These changes in the Penal Code and Constitution have had serious consequences for the Salvadorean women, such as high maternal mortality, suicide among young girls victims of rape, and the unjust incarceration of approximately 181 women. The violence young girls and women face daily in their homes and in public spaces is further increased by the State's total ban on abortion. In short, the State's current law on abortion criminalizes women for being women and denies them their right to life and health.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

I AM A SALVADOREAN WOMAN and the law against abortion goes through my body. To be a woman in El Salvador means to be potentially accused of murder and deprived of freedom if you have an obstetric labor complication, such as a miscarriage or a stillbirth. Under the Salvadorean Constitution, the criminalization of abortion impedes us from deciding over our bodies, life and health. The State forces young girls and women to continue unwanted pregnancies even if their life is in danger or when it's a product of rape. I couldn't accept the institutional violence against women and girls in my country. Therefore

I decided to go to the women's prison of Ilopango and meet Teodora and the other women of The Seventeen. From the start, I felt connected to Teodora, I admired her resilience and her strength after a decade of having been unjustly imprisoned. The way she gave strength to the other women, as well as the sisterhood they have woven during these years and how they support each other in such a hostile place, inspired me to do this film. This is my way to contribute to their struggle for freedom, so their voices resonate beyond the prison walls and to reclaim autonomy over our bodies.

PRODUCER'S STATEMENT

FLY SO FAR IS AN URGENT FILM. Its relevance goes beyond denouncing and searching for justice in the case of Teodora Vázquez and her fellow inmates in El Salvador. It is a film that follows some of the fundamental values of the documentary filmmaking: giving voice to the underrepresented, discussing the human condition and producing new perspectives and realities. As a producer it is a privilege for me to be part of this project. In the first place, for having the opportunity to create a space for discussion of urgent issues such as abortion and gender violence among a public that goes beyond El Salvador and Sweden. Second, for being included in a feminist project that discusses gender norms and gives voice to women who have literally been deprived of their freedom and uprooted from their contexts and life projects. I have total confidence in the director's artistic and political sensibility.

DIRECTOR'S BIO
