NATIONWIDE -FEBRUARY 2026 - (USAnews.com) Leadership has long been measured by visibility, velocity, and results. Yet behind closed doors, many accomplished leaders admit to a quieter struggle. They have mastered execution but feel disconnected from themselves. Kari Ghanem has built her life's work around addressing that gap, helping leaders shift from operating on autopilot to leading with intention, presence, and inner authority.

As founder of www.karighanem.com, Kari works with founders, executives, and visionary leaders who sense that the next level of success will not come from doing more, but from becoming more aligned. Her coaching does not focus on surface-level performance. It focuses on awareness, identity, and the internal posture from which every decision is made.

The Moment Leaders Begin To Question The Old Model

Most of Kari's clients do not arrive because they are failing. They arrive because they are succeeding and feel the cost of that success. Years of pushing forward, meeting expectations, and carrying responsibility can create distance from one's own inner compass. Decisions become reactive. Joy becomes conditional.

Kari understands this moment intimately. Over more than twenty years as a coach, she has observed how easily leaders adopt roles that once served them but later confine them. The achiever. The fixer. The reliable one. These identities often go unquestioned until they begin to feel heavy.

Her work begins by slowing the pace. Presence becomes the first practice. From there, leaders can finally hear what has been drowned out by obligation and noise.

Coaching That Prioritizes Awareness Over Advice

Unlike traditional coaching models that emphasize tactics and timelines, Kari centers her work on awareness. She believes clarity precedes change. Rather than telling clients what to do, she helps them notice how they are being.

This includes examining patterns of self-talk, control, and over-responsibility. Many leaders are unaware of how much of their energy is spent managing perceptions or anticipating outcomes. Kari brings these patterns into conscious awareness, where choice becomes possible.

Her sessions are known for their depth and honesty. She does not avoid discomfort or complexity. Instead, she creates a space where leaders can safely explore questions they rarely voice: Who am I when I am not producing? What do I actually want now? What am I afraid to release?

Presence As A Leadership Skill

One of the central themes in Kari's work is presence. In her view, presence is not a soft concept. It is a leadership skill with tangible impact. Leaders who are present listen more clearly, communicate with greater integrity, and make decisions that are aligned rather than reactive.

Kari teaches that presence requires shedding constant mental projection. Many leaders live in the future, anticipating problems or outcomes. Others remain anchored in past experiences that shaped their beliefs about authority and worth. Presence brings leaders back into the current moment, where clarity resides.

This shift often transforms how leaders relate to their teams and organizations. When a leader is grounded, others feel it. Trust increases. Conversations become more honest. Culture changes organically.

A Breakthrough Rooted In Self Trust

A defining breakthrough for many of Kari's clients occurs when they reconnect with self-trust. Years of external validation can erode confidence in one's own inner knowing. Leaders become dependent on data, approval, or consensus to feel secure.

Kari helps clients rebuild that trust by reconnecting them with their internal signals. Through reflection, dialogue, and presence-based practices, leaders begin to recognize when a decision feels aligned versus forced. This internal calibration becomes a powerful guide.

As self-trust strengthens, clients often report a renewed sense of ease. Decisions require less justification. Boundaries become clearer. Leadership becomes less performative and more authentic.

A Voice Resonating Beyond One On One Work

Kari Ghanem's perspective on conscious leadership is reaching a wider audience through her writing and speaking. She is the author of one book and a co-author of another, and her insights continue to resonate with readers seeking depth beyond productivity.

Her upcoming appearance at the I-DIAS Euro Global SheLeads - She Empowers Conclave Week Women's Conference in Paris marks an important milestone. There, she will share her message with leaders from around the world who are reexamining how power, success, and presence intersect in modern leadership.

Through her platform at www.karighanem.com, Kari continues to articulate a vision of leadership that is both strong and self-aware, ambitious and grounded.

Award Recognition: Best Transformational Coach in the United States of 2026

Kari's impact on the coaching world has been officially recognized with her recent award as the Best Transformational Coach in the United States of 2026 by Best of Best Review. This prestigious honor acknowledges Kari's unique approach to leadership and personal development, highlighting her ability to guide high-level leaders toward deeper self-awareness, presence, and authenticity.

Why Conscious Leadership Is The Future

The leadership landscape is changing. Employees, partners, and communities are responding to leaders who demonstrate authenticity and emotional intelligence. Kari's work speaks directly to this evolution.

She does not ask leaders to abandon ambition. She asks them to anchor it in awareness. When leaders operate from presence and self-trust, success becomes sustainable rather than draining.

Her coaching offers a reminder that leadership begins internally. When leaders align with themselves, their influence becomes more powerful and more human.
