Garuda

- The foundation of Garuda was based on the personality tests that became a standardised part of the job interviews conducted in the 1970s. These tests originated from psychology studies that screened for certain mental illnesses and were used – unaltered – to assess whether the employee was suitable for the job or not.
- The founder of Garuda, Finn Havaleschka, found this problematic. With his experience and education within the field of social science, he set out to develop an accessible job interviewing tool that was produced solely for the business community and that would help employees and employers understand each other – and themselves – better.
