You let go first. No, you let go.
No, you. No, you.

Rebecca? All we can see is your ceiling.
You should have figured out Teams by now!

Trying to prank Stella was useless. Nothing ever bothered her.

She didn't even notice when they took her desk and her chair.

No one had laughed at his first three jokes.

Now Nicholas hoped the seminar guests would just leave.

Eric had a good feeling before signing the deal, then out of nowhere came a deep regret.

Everyone was sick of Jennifer's tired face.
They were univocally pleased when Lule joined the meeting on Teams.

Ryan was displeased, but the rules were clear.
Brent's suit had the biggest checkers, so he got to keep the notepad.

The megaphone prank wasn't funny back when Ron was new in Maintenance 19 years ago, and it still wasn't funny today.

Already when he presented himself as “Moses” during the interview, the managers should have realized he wasn’t suitable for working in infrastructure.

Tracy was glad «Handsome Henry» had come to help. Stanley, however, realized his chances of a date were now ruined.

No task was simple enough for Ann. This time, all she was supposed to do was to hold up and present a basket of fruit.

Try to look natural, it's for the annual report, the photographer demanded. But Johnny thought it was a stupid idea to cut a hole in the paper with plumbing pliers.

Barb from IT smiled at the middle manager, but she wasn't joking: his mustache looked that ridiculous.

Everyone thought Marketing was celebrating new sales, but it was actually just Jeffrey who had gotten the others into yoga.

Marketing was halfway through the infection control workshop and had just completed the part about masks.

The topic after the break was «distancing».

Money can't talk.

It pisses me off when you don't use margins!"

Imagine that, both Ryan and Jacob were into synchronized swimming.

They never should have gotten that piercing chain while they were drunk. But still, they were just playfighting.

It was weird-hat day at the sales department. Sandra salvaged the situation by putting her hair up in a ball, while Steve just smiled stupidly and pretended like nothing.

«Am I too old for hoodies?» Larry had asked his son before leaving for work. He ignored the answer.

No one got the whole shoes-off deal, nevertheless, Peter was the undisputed champion. He could spin eight times without falling off the chair.

Jessica took a bit of a chance when asking her mother to provide them with entertainment during the company's Christmas party. She was such a hoot at the revue in 1972.

Carol always felt like taking a nap before the meeting, but now it was kind of hard to get started.

In his home office, Timothy has changed his screensaver to save him more nagging from his wife.

«Can't you see I'm in a meeting? »

About The Author

Hakon Sonneland is a writer and artist based in rural Norway.

Having published more than 20 titles on major Norwegian publishing houses (under his native name Håkon Forfod Sønneland), his international breakthrough came with his comedic take on business life in the Synenti Series.

As an artist, he became known for exhibiting a fly swatter made of glass (a single-use utensil), and a bikini made of sandpaper (with the sandy side inwards).

He caused a stir when he convinced his local museum not to take entrance fees and instead pay people up to 100 dollars for entry.

He also gives talks on how to think outside the box.
